At least if your grandmother drank Lambrusco-mine, of course, was a whiskeydrinking hell-raiser who drove a Camaro late into her seventies, and wouldn't have touched a purple fizzy wine even if you'd paid her fifty bucks.

Anyway, enough of that. The real point is this: I recently tasted some artisanal Lambruscos that will make you forget you ever heard the word Riunite. The producer is Lini, and the wines are made by fourth-generation winemaker Alicia Lini, whose family has been producing Lambrusco in Correggio, in Reggio Emilia, since 1910. This isn't zillion-case production plonk, as a lot of Lambrusco is; these are fresh, vibrant sparkling wines, ideal for summer drinking, and not overwhelmingly expensive, either. (.....)
